context (SDIC). For three key measures (percent Black, percent Hispanic, and Entropy – a measure of ethno-racial diversity), we find that block level Census statistics frequently do not capture the actual context of individuals within them. More problematic, we uncover systematic spatial patterns in the contextual variables at all three scales.

people live within a particular culture, it is the people, more than the geography, that constitute culture. So when you think of a culture, think about the people. That being said, it is also important to understand that cultures of people are not static but, rather, dynamic. This means that cultures change; they are fluid, always moving.
