Wireline logging can be defined as being "The acquisition and analysis of geophysical data performed as a function of well bore depth, together with the provision of related services." Note that "wireline logging" and "mud logging" are not the same, yet are closely linked through the integration of the data sets.

Each tool command in a particular table may correspond to a specific function to be performed by a respective logging tool comprising the sonde. All such commands in a given table may be called up by the controller from memory in response to a corresponding sequence command from the surface computer corresponding with the desired table.

Logging vendors are responsible for delivering data that has been acquired with instruments what were calibrated and run properly, providing documentation of this in both delivered hard and soft copy data. However, the client is responsible to see that this is done. The wellsite is the front line of well log quality.

Data Acquisition and Reporting Guidelines October 2011 3 Type 2 - deviation from a well or field data acquisition program during the course of drilling a well in response to operational issues, or in response to changing reservoir conditions. Where an operator seeks to make a Type 1 deviation, the request must be documented and supported in activities can represent between 5% and 15% of total well costs. It is important therefore to ensure that the cost of acquisition can be justified by the value of information generated and that thereafter the information is effectively managed. To this end a number of questions need to be asked before commencing logging operations, these include: 1.

An acoustic well logging method employing a tool having at least two acoustic transmitters and at least two acoustic receivers. In a preferred embodiment, one receiver is positioned midway between the two transmitters, and the other receiver is spaced from the first receiver along the longitudinal axis of the tool between the transmitters.

Optionally raw sensor data may be displayed. Multiple log plot windows may be opened for comparison of, for example, main and repeat log sections. Log plots may be paused and scrolled to any depth and annotations added, while data acquisition continues. Depth correlation is achieved while logging, with the screen plot
